Subject: STATEMENT RE: MARTY SLATE

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press Secretary

For Immediate Release

February 24, 1997

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

Hillary and I were deeply saddened to learn of the death of Marty Slate. Marty has been a dear friend since our years at Yale Law School and was the quintessential public servant.

From his days as a Freedom Rider in Mississippi to his years as a senior civil servant at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the Internal Revenue Service, Marty spent his entire life working to make sure our laws were fair and applied justly.

Four years ago, I was delighted when Marty answered my call to return to public service. As Executive Director of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, he brought a new standard of excellence to that agency. He improved the PBGC's level of customer service and its financial management, winning a Innovation in American Government Award from the John F. Kennedy School and several Vice Presidential Hammer Awards for Excellence in Government. Marty fought successfully for important new legislation that brought renewed financial stability to the Corporation, expanded pension coverage, and ensured that millions of Americans' pensions were more secure.

Hillary and I will miss him greatly. Our thoughts and prayers are with Cookie and his family on this sad day.

EDITOR'S NOTE: Mrs. Clinton will be joined at the event by Dr. Kristen Zarfos and a former patient, Constance Shorter (Troy, Michigan). Dr. Zarfos sat in the First Lady's box during the State of the Union speech and was highlighted by the President as the surgeon who spurred the national movement for this legislation. Any press who would like to arrange an interview with either Dr. Zarfos or Ms. Shorter should call 202/456-7150.

MOST INFLUENTIAL WORKING MOTHERS

Here are the American women who are wielding power

What does it mean to be an influential working mother? We looked for striking role models, women who have raised the bar in their fields, taken risks, broken down barriers in male-dominated arenas and forged new territory so the rest of us could follow.

In selecting this first annual list of 25 women, we used the following criteria: The honorees had to have children 18 years old or younger, and either had to have gained exceptional power in their professions or caused a profound change in the culture of the workplace, making it significantly friendlier to parents trying to achieve balance in their work and family lives.

The finalists come from a wide range of experiences—from Elaine Pagels, the professor of religion at Princeton University whose scholarship raised the consciousness of the entire Christian community about the role of women in the church, to Pat Summitt, the NCAA champion basketball coach who helped young female athletes excel and come to national fame in a male-dominated sport. There are also representatives from the corporate world, politics, labor, TV, journalism, medicine, law and the arts.

And significantly, our honorees include the heroines of the workplace. These are the women who have literally changed the mind of corporate America to accept the idea that family-friendly policies are a legitimate business concern. With incredible imagination and courage, these working mothers have carved out unique careers: In doing so, Fran Sussner Rodgers of WFD, which provides corporate work/life services, Dana Friedman, cofounder of the Families and Work Institute; Barbara Reisman of the Child Care Action Campaign; Karen Nussbaum, founder of 9 to 5 and now director of the AFL-CIO Working Women's Department; and Donna Lenhoff, general counsel for the Women's Legal Defense Fund, have brought about revolutionary changes in the working conditions of women throughout the country. They have effectively worked to convince American corporations that supporting employees' family lives is good for the bottom line.

What qualities compelled these women to go all out for their dreams? It's hard to generalize, but as they shared their stories with us, certain similarities emerged:

- Many on our list said their ambition originated in their birth families, and noted that their parents encouraged them to excel in school and in extracurricular activities.
- Most are married and describe their mates as unusually supportive of their careers and active as co-parents.
- Most had children fairly late—after 30 and often after 35.
- None spoke of having master plans for their careers. Rather, they kept going, taking one assignment after another, seizing opportunities when they were offered.

Join us in saluting these remarkable working mothers! Here they are, in alphabetical order.

1. JILL BARAD, 45, CEO, Mattel, Inc., the world's largest toy maker; married, mother of two sons, 17 and 14.

You don't find many moms at the head of major corporations in America. In fact, Barad is the only woman to head a Fortune 500 company. She recently assumed power as CEO of Mattel after serving in the company in various capacities for over 15 years. But she made her mark early, as a junior executive in 1983, when she asked for a bigger challenge and was given Mattel's then-sleepy Barbie division to run. Under her direction annual sales grew from $200 million to nearly $1.5 billion. Now she presides over a business with estimated 1997 sales of $4 billion. As we went to press, Barad was engineering another bold move—the purchase of Tyco, the maker of Matchbox cars, to increase global sales.

Her firsthand experience of trying to juggle work and family has made her an avid supporter of Mattel's family-friendly policies that for the past four years have earned it a spot on our list of 100 Best Companies.

2. CHARLENE BARSHEFSKY, 46, acting United States Trade Representative; married, mother of two daughters, 13 and eight.

"Our toughest trade negotiator," is how President Clinton describes Barshefsky, the nation's senior trade negotiator, whom he designated for this cabinet-level post. Barshefsky identifies her top priority as opening global markets to American products, and she expresses impatience with those who advocate nonreciprocal trade practices. In trade, she says, "You get what you give. It's that simple. There are no free rides."

Barshefsky was recruited to the government from Steptoe & Johnson, one of Washington's top law firms, where she served as cochair of the international division. She has successfully faced down the Japanese and Chinese, hammering out milestone agreements that opened Japanese markets to American products and cracked down on Chinese factories pirating American intellectual property—videos, CDs, software and books.

A devoted mother, Barshefsky monitors homework and music lessons via transatlantic telephone, and admits her juggling act would be impossible were it not for her exceptionally supportive husband.

3. CAROL BARTZ, 48, CEO and Chairman, Autodesk, the world's leading manufacturer of computer-design software; married, mother of one daughter, eight.

In three years, Bartz has doubled Autodesk's sales to $600 million, making it the fourth-largest manufacturer of personal-computer software in the world. One of the most powerful women in Silicon Valley, Bartz has won respect from computer industry insiders for introducing effective management to a company known for being long on creativity, but short on organization and strategic planning. Within months of arriving at Autodesk from Sun Microsystems, the strong-willed Bartz changed Autodesk's direction, jettisoning some new products, committing to others and leveraging existing customers. Her goal now is to increase sales to $1 billion a year.

Under Bartz's leadership, Autodesk's family-friendly policies have been expanded to include adoption leave, parenting classes and stronger telecommuting and flex-acking the glass ceiling and leading us into the future time programs. Crediting her own success to her love of math and science, Bartz encourages Autodesk employees to teach these subjects on a volunteer basis—on company time—up to four hours a month in the local public schools, whether they have children or not.

4. LAUREL G. BELLOWS, 48, partner, Bellows and Bellows, Chicago law firm specializing in investment fraud cases and women's business ventures; married, mother of one daughter, 15.

Five years ago, as president of the 22,000-member Chicago Bar, Bellows invited women lawyers to breakfast to discuss the discrimination they faced on the job. Seventy lawyers crowded into her office to describe a litany of wrongs relating to legal education, hiring and promotion practices and sexual harassment on the job. That meeting shook Bellows, who had been largely untouched by sexism in her own firm. As a result, the Chicago attorney has become one of the nation's most powerful advocates for women in the legal profession. Now serving the final year of a three-year term as president of the American Bar Association's Commission on Women in the Profession, Bellows has overseen the publication of a pair of reports documenting the persistence of sexism in the nation's law schools and law firms and recommending changes to bring about its end.

A brilliant attorney, Bellows is not easily thwarted. In response to the failure of some law school deans to adopt the suggested reforms, she has induced law-school deans to lobby the deans in favor of the Commission's recommendations.

5. CANDICE BERGEN, 50, five-time Emmy winner, actress, star of the CBS hit series Murphy Brown; widow, mother of one daughter, 11.

After the death of her husband, film director Louis Malle, last year, fans worried that Bergen might not return to fighting sexist dragons as Murphy Brown—America's feistiest single mother on television. But back she came for a ninth season this past fall, the woman who talked back to Vice President Dan Quayle when he assailed the character she plays on the show. And this year, she has as her new boss and foil the incomparable comedian Lily Tomlin. Bergen, a talented comedian herself, has won the loyalty of women viewers for portraying the experience of a single mother without sentimentality, showing the chaos and humor of a life spent juggling the competing demands of ambition and attachment, work and children.

6. CATHIE BLACK, 52, president, Hearst Magazines; married, mother of a daughter and a son, nine and five.

Black has been shattering glass ceilings in the magazine and publishing industries for 25 years. Last year, she made history as the first woman to be named president of Hearst Magazines, the world's largest publisher of monthly magazines. No woman has ever wielded as much power in the magazine industry as she. All 16 of Hearst's magazines—among them Cosmopolitan, Good Housekeeping, Esquire and Harper's Bazaar—are published each month in more than 100 countries with worldwide monthly readership of nearly 125 million.

Black started in publishing in 1972 as Ms. magazine's first advertising manager. Later, at New York magazine, she became the first woman publisher of a weekly consumer magazine. She was also the first president and publisher of USA Today. Industry leaders say in addition to brains, drive and stamina, Black sees trends before they emerge and turns them into corporate revenue.

7. FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, 49, attorney, author, advocate for children; married, mother of one daughter, who turns 17 this month.

The nation's first professional woman to serve as First Lady is without doubt one of the most visible and powerful advocates for children and working mothers in the country. Last summer, for example, she delivered an impassioned speech at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago, calling for "a nation that doesn't just talk about family values but acts in ways that value families." Mrs. Clinton has had a distinguished career as a lawyer serving on the impeachment inquiry staff of the House Judiciary Committee during the Watergate hearings; she was also chair of the American Bar Association's Commission on Women in the Profession. For many years Mrs. Clinton juggled a legal career, motherhood and her role as the wife and first lady of Arkansas. Her understanding of the pressures that bear down on working families has informed all her efforts during her four years in the White House, from her support for universal health care to her tours overseas advocating women's economic and political rights.

8. KATIE COURIC, 40, co-anchor, NBC News' Today; married, mother of two daughters, five and one.

"I'm not a TV star who happens to be a mother. I'm a working mom who happens to have a high-profile job that puts me in the spotlight," says Couric with the casual modesty that has helped to make her one of the world's most popular television anchors. Each day some 75 million television viewers worldwide tune in to see two-time Emmy Award-winning Couric, whose presence since 1991 on Today has helped restore the program to its No. 1 spot in the morning-show ratings. Couric's high energy, "girl-next-door" style appeals to viewers, but her skills as a journalist and interviewer are what keep them coming back. Subjects who have underestimated her toughness, including 1996 Republican Presidential aspirant Bob Dole, whom she clobbered with questions about the addictive nature of tobacco, do not leave the studio unimpressed.

9. CONNIE K. DUCKWORTH, 42, managing director of Goldman Sachs, the investment bank and securities firm, and manager of the Chicago operations of its Fixed Income Division; married, mother of two girls, five months and four years, and two boys, two and six years.

Duckworth is an undisputed star in the financial industry, a field traditionally inhospitable to women. But she claims that has changed. "Performance is what counts. The industry provides women with a level playing field; the financial rewards allow us to hire enough help at home so we can perform more easily at work."

Duckworth came to Goldman Sachs in 1981 after working as a senior financial analyst for Atlantic Richfield. In 1990, she became manager of Chicago operations of the Fixed Income Division, where the daily bond transactions she oversees typically run hundreds of millions of dollars. She served for five years on the Goldman Sachs diversity committee—which works on equity issues relating to women and minorities. During her tenure on the committee, it created the industry's first backup child care center, located at headquarters in New York. The group also provided adoption leave, a liberal maternity leave and a mentoring program for women managers.

10. DANA FRIEDMAN, 45, senior vice president, CorporateFamily Solutions, a company that designs, implements and evaluates work/family programs; married, mother of three daughters, 10, six and four.

Fresh out of college in 1974, Friedman took a job as receptionist with a child care advocacy group in Washington, D.C. In six months, she was legislative director of the organization and testifying in Congress about the need for child care—long before she had children of her own. Since then she has become one of the nation's most powerful champions of child care, elder care and other work/family issues. A skilled researcher and writer, Friedman has always sought to get work/family policies into the mainstream as a legitimate business issue. In 1989, she and research expert Ellen Galinsky, whose grown children make her ineligible for this list, cofounded the Families and Work Institute, a nonprofit organization that conducts research on business, government and community efforts to help people balance their work/family responsibilities. Clients have included Johnson & Johnson, IBM, AT&T, the U.S. Department of Labor and the U.S. Postal Service. Now, as senior vice president of CorporateFamily Solutions, Friedman is creating a work/family division for this corporate child care provider. Her new post allows her more time with her husband and three young daughters.

11. JAMIE GORELICK, 46, Deputy Attorney General of the United States; married, mother of a son and a daughter, eight and three.

Along with acting Trade Representative Charlene Barshefsky, Gorelick is one of the stars of the Clinton Administration. When Gorelick arrived at the Justice Department in 1994 as second-in-command to Attorney General Janet Reno, the vast federal agency was in bureaucratic disarray. Gorelick is widely credited with picking up the pieces and transforming Justice into a model agency—well run, effective and family friendly. Gorelick and Attorney General Reno have expanded flextime, experimented with telecommuting and encouraged all federal workers, especially women in low-level jobs, to get more education and advance.

Gorelick arrived at Justice after a year's stint at the Department of Defense where she served as General Counsel and Chief Legal Officer, supervising the work of 6,000 attorneys. Prior to government work, she was a litigator in a private Washington, D.C., law firm, where she specialized in civil and criminal cases. In 1992 she served as president of the D.C. Bar, a 60,000-member association. Insiders predict the sky's the limit for Gorelick.

12. MARTA KAUFFMAN, 40, cocreator and executive producer of the NBC hit comedy Friends; married, mother of a daughter and a son, eight and five.

Kauffman and her two partners at Bright/Kauffman/Crane Productions have used television's enormous power to present a perceptive and entertaining new image of the relationship between men and women to a mass audience. Based loosely on Kauffman's earlier adventures in New York City with writing partner David Crane, the program breaks new ground exploring the rich complexities of the twentysomething generation, and offering a provocative view of the changing mores of society. Kauffman's nonsexist stance and powerful honesty seem to threaten some key men in the industry. "They call me a strong woman, a tough cookie," she says, "but they think I am something worse." The huge success of her show, however, gives Kauffman and her partners unprecedented clout in Hollywood. The three recently signed a whopping $35 million deal with Warner Brothers to develop new television programming. In the works now—a comedy starring former Cheers star Kirstie Alley that will debut next season.

13. SHELLY LAZARUS, 48, CEO, Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide; married, mother of a daughter, 17, and two sons, 22 and 10.

As CEO of one of the largest advertising agencies on the planet, Lazarus is one of the most powerful women in the industry. But when she started as an account executive at Ogilvy & Mather 25 years ago, Lazarus recalls, "I was usually the only woman at meetings. Clients would ask me what women think, as if I were there to represent all the women in the world." Things have changed. As CEO, Lazarus now presides over a company that operates 275 offices in 64 countries with total (1995) billings of $7.6 billion. And there is no shortage of women joining her in positions of authority. Half of Ogilvy's partners and senior partners are women, and Lazarus took over the CEO position from Charlotte Beers, 61, who remains Worldwide chairman. How did Lazarus get where she is? Her rise began 10 years ago when she became president of Ogilvy's direct marketing division, but her most spectacular feat occurred in 1994 when, as President of O&M North America, she wooed and won the $500 million-plus IBM account, the ad world's largest plum.

14. DONNA LENHOFF, 45, General Counsel, Women's Legal Defense Fund; married, mother of one daughter, four.

No recent political victory has been more important for working mothers than the 1993 passage of the Family and Medical Leave Act. Much of the credit for this historic win goes to Lenhoff, longtime chief attorney for Washington's influential Women's Legal Defense Fund. Lenhoff drafted the first version of the Family and Medical Leave Act back in 1984, then spent the next nine years fighting to win passage of the measure. The law grants working parents unpaid time off to care for newborns and adoptees and sick children or family members. As vice chair of the bipartisan Family Leave Commission, Lenhoff supervised research proving that the FMLA helps millions of employees without significantly hurting business. Lenhoff has worked as an attorney at the Legal Defense Fund for 18 years, helping to successfully establish some of working women's most fundamental rights, including the right to collect disability insurance when pregnant and the right to sue for sexual harassment under federal antidiscrimination laws.

THE 25 MOST INFLUENTIAL WORKING MOTHERS

15. PATTY MURRAY, 46, United States Democratic Senator from Washington State; married, mother of a son and a daughter, 20 and 17.

Early in her career as a grass-roots activist in Washington State, Patty Murray went to Olympia, the capital, to lobby for better schools, where she was told by a local legislator to go home—she was a nobody, “just a mom in tennis shoes.” Far from squelching Murray, the put-down motivated her to build a political career as “the mom in tennis shoes.” After winning a seat in the state legislature, Murray ran for the U.S. Senate in 1992. Drastically outspent by her Republican opponent, she defied the odds and won overwhelmingly, becoming the first woman from her state to serve in the U.S. Senate. On Capitol Hill, she has been a tireless worker and a skilled coalition builder, sponsoring bills such as the Women’s Pension Equity Act, which allows spouses of employed men to open their own IRA accounts, and the Small Business Preservation Act, which lowers estate taxes on mom-and-pop operators from 55 percent to 15 percent. She also worked for the passage of the Family and Medical Leave Act and to increase child care services in the welfare bill.

16. IRENE NATTIVIDAD, 48, principal, Natividad & Associates, and chair, The National Commission on Working Women; married, mother of one son, 12.

Natividad, a native of the Philippines, has devoted her career to promoting the political and economic power of women. A masterful politician and a brilliant public strategist, she is known for bringing people together to push a common agenda. For instance, during the 1996 Presidential election season, Natividad led a coalition of 110 women’s organizations in a nonpartisan voter outreach campaign that targeted 11 states where female representation at the ballot box was low. The bilingual drive registered 55,000 new voters and created a model of voter outreach that can be replicated on the state and local levels. Natividad is best known for her 10-year stint, beginning in 1981, as a leader and president of the National Women’s Political Caucus, which helps women run for office on both the local and national levels. She is also director of the biennial Global Summit of Women, and recently held a meeting in Miami where some 500 corporate leaders, policymakers and women activists from around the world shared programs and ideas on how to increase the economic power of women.

17. KAREN NUSSBAUM, 46, director, AFL-CIO Working Women’s Department; married, mother of two boys, 14 and 12, and one daughter, eight.

Workplace discrimination of women did not exist as an issue until 1973 when Nussbaum, a college dropout working in a clerical job, began organizing her colleagues. Outraged by their low pay and miserable working conditions, they decided to found the organization led by 9 to 5 with Nussbaum as their director. She has been fighting for working women’s rights ever since. In 1993, Nussbaum stepped out of her union role to lead the U.S. Department of Labor’s Women’s Bureau, where she commissioned a landmark survey called Working Women Count. Over 250,000 working women responded. The poll revealed that in every category, women share the same aspirations: They want fair pay, health insurance, help in managing their dual responsibilities of family and work, and respect. Now Nussbaum is working to realize these goals as director of the Working Women’s Department of the AFL-CIO.

18. ROSIE O’DONNELL, 34, actress, comedian, host of ABC’s The Rosie O’Donnell Show; single mother of an adopted son, one and a half.

Shortly after O’Donnell’s popular daytime talk show debuted last June, a columnist wrote, “She’s taken the trash out of talk . . . and for that she should be given a Nobel Prize.” Viewers love Rosie for elevating the fare that is heard on talk TV. Within weeks of her debut, the quick-witted, compassionate and funny O’Donnell was earning the highest ratings of any talk show in 10 years. Trained as a stand-up comedian, with a number of movies to her credit, O’Donnell took the job as talk-show host because she wanted more time with her child. Now she takes son Parker to work, and uses her television program as a forum to make the case for working families. O’Donnell’s commitment to children and parents goes far beyond lip service. A spokesperson for the Children’s Defense Fund, she is exploring an opportunity to underwrite a foundation to fund child care centers around the country.

19. ELAINE PAGELS, 52, Harrington Spear Paine Professor of Religion, Princeton University; married, mother of a daughter and a son, 10 and eight, plus three stepsons, 26, 24 and 19, from her second marriage.

Pagels is a towering force in the theological community and a beacon for women seeking a voice in the Church. By exploring the suppression of women by early Church leaders, Pagels has raised the Christian community’s consciousness about sexism in organized religion. Her impressive scholarship—she possesses a working command of Greek, Latin, German, Hebrew, French, Italian and Coptic—has earned her international respect. Her books The Gnostic Gospels, Adam, Eve and the Serpent, and The Origin of Satan (all published by Random House) are among those rare works to win both scholarly and popular acclaim.

20. BARBARA REISMAN, 47, executive director, Child Care Action Campaign; married, mother of a daughter and a son, 16 and 13.

In 1971, as a student at Brown University, Reisman won a $5,000 travel grant—a prize that had never before gone to a female student. She used it to see how other nations organized and paid for child care. Her subsequent experiences in France, Israel, Sweden and Denmark changed her life. Reisman returned to the United States and became a community organizer in Brockton, Massachusetts, where she worked to improve the availability and quality of child care. In 1977, she went to work for the United Electrical Workers Union where she promoted work/family benefits within the labor movement. Now, as executive director of the Child Care Action Campaign, Reisman stresses two basic messages—that children need quality care and that their parents need help paying for it. Reisman and her colleagues work to that end by organizing partnerships of local government, business, labor and nonprofit groups to set their own child care priorities and devise funding mechanisms to develop them.

21. FRAN SUSSNER RODGERS, 50, founder and CEO of WFD (formerly Work-Family Directions), the nation's leading provider of corporate work/life services; married, mother of two daughters, 18 and 15.

Rodgers's career as the premier creator of services that humanize the workplace was motivated by her own experience. Her first child was born with severe asthma. For two years Rodgers struggled to meet the requirements of her educational consulting job, while caring for a sick child who kept her awake by night and worried by day. Feeling she was being split in half by these competing demands, Rodgers quit her job and became a management consultant to businesses and hospitals in the Boston area. In 1983, after conducting studies for a number of companies, she was asked by IBM to set up a national work/family program for its employees. Eventually she was providing similar services to other major corporations such as DuPont, Aetna and Hewlett Packard. Those services evolved into what's now called LifeWorks, which helps nearly half a million employees deal with life transitions related to child care, their children's educational needs, adoption and elder care. Last year, the service saved their companies an average of 17 hours per worker that otherwise would have been spent tracking down the needed information.

22. LINDA SANFORD, 44, General Manager, System/390, one of IBM's most profitable divisions, employing 6,000 people worldwide; married, mother of a son and a daughter, 18 and 16.

One of the most influential women in corporate America, Sanford is among a handful of women holding such a high rank. She has earned enormous respect for revitalizing IBM's vast mainframe operation, which she took over in 1993 at what she calls "its lowest point." Sanford says the division's poor performance was "a tremendous opportunity," enabling her to reinvent the manufacturing, development, distribution and marketing of IBM's most powerful computer system. After four years with Sanford at the helm, the division is now one of IBM's most profitable. The only female general manager for an IBM product division, Sanford is cochair of the Women's Task Force, a group of IBM's most talented women. Sanford and the Task Force work closely with Fran Rodgers (see above) to create programs that solve the needs of women at IBM. A strong proponent of a flexible workplace, Sanford champions the idea of evaluating workers by "measuring their results, not where or how the work is done."

23. SUE SHELLENBARGER, 45, Work and Family columnist, the Wall Street Journal, and talk-show host; married, mother of a daughter and a son, nine and six. Step-mother to three children in their 20s.

Five years ago, Shellenbarger struck a significant, symbolic victory for the cause of working parents when the Wall Street Journal—the preeminent newspaper of the corporate and financial community—agreed to run her column called "Work and Family," in one stroke legitimizing work/family issues as a business concern. Her column now gives national voice to the struggle of working parents to balance their competing responsibilities of job and home. Shellenbarger's interest in work/family issues originated from her own struggles while working as a beat reporter and then bureau chief for the Wall Street Journal's Chicago office. "I felt pulled all the time whether I left the office early or stayed late," Shellenbarger recalls. Now she not only writes about the benefits of flextime, she lives them—working out of her Portland, Oregon, home, getting to her desk at four a.m. and working until three p.m., with time out to get her kids to school. Shellenbarger also hosts the Work and Family talk show, which airs from 10 a.m. to noon EST Saturdays on the Wall Street Journal Radio Network.

24. PAT SUMMITT, 44, head coach of the University of Tennessee's NCAA Division One national championship women's basketball team; married, mother of one son, six

Twenty years ago, it would have been unimaginable that the highest-paid coach at a large state university would be a woman. But at the University of Tennessee that's precisely the case—and with good reason. Summitt, coach of Tennessee's National College Athletic Association (NCAA) Division One championship women's basketball team, has the best win-lose percentage on campus. Every Summitt basketball team in the past 11 years has won at least 20 games; 14 of her Tennessee teams earned berths in the NCAA playoffs and four of her teams—1987, 1989, 1991 and 1996—won NCAA Division One titles. Summitt also won an Olympic gold medal in 1984 when she coached the U.S. women's Olympic basketball team. Women's basketball was small potatoes back in 1974 when Summitt arrived at the University of Tennessee. "Just a handful of spectators showed up that first season," she recalls. Things have changed considerably. Summitt's teams play before audiences of 8,000 or more, and have helped transform women's basketball into a major sport.

25. VALORA WASHINGTON, 44, Program Director W.K. Kellogg Foundation; single mother of an adopted son and daughter, 12 and five.

As the Kellogg Foundation program director, Washington has dispensed in excess of $86 million in the past six years to a variety of programs to benefit children and families. The mother of two adopted children, Washington has made finding adoptive families for the 100,000 children nationwide who linger in foster care her top priority. She created and is managing Families for Kids, a $42 million project operating in 11 states which supports families that are able to stay together, and provides for the speedy adoption (within one year) of kids whose birth families cannot care for them. Washington hopes Families for Kids will eventually be used as a model for revamping foster care in all 50 states. She has also devised a $3 million School Readiness Program that helps communities prepare their most vulnerable students for kindergarten and a $2 million program for elementary students in Michigan that has improved their science scores.

Department of Education's first "National Awards for Model Professional Development" in Washington, DC on Wednesday, February 5, 1997. As the President made clear in his State of the Union Address last night, "...my number one priority for the next four years is to ensure that all Americans have the best education in the world." In order to achieve that goal, we need strong, safe schools with clear standards of achievement and we must have talented and dedicated teachers in every classroom. We must also reward and recognize our best teachers. The awards being presented today echo the President's challenge by honoring five schools and school districts for their achievements in increasing teacher effectiveness and on-going teacher training and development.
