Understanding the Health Care Needs of People Living with HIV — Recommendations for Strengthening the Programs that Serve Them

by Jeffrey S. Crowley, M.P.H. and Michael D. Shriver

INTRODUCTION

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) has recently announced a dramatic decline in AIDS deaths.

Advances in biomedical research and improved prevention efforts have brought hope that our nation is making progress in fighting the HIV epidemic. For the first time, medications and treatment strategies are available that have demonstrated an ability to restore immune functioning weakened by the progression of HIV disease. Indeed, Time magazine has named Dr. David Ho, a researcher credited with developing some of the new treatment regimens, as 1996's Man of the Year.

While we celebrate the power of modern science, we must not allow current treatment advances to detract from finding a cure for AIDS. The HIV epidemic is not over. We are also reminded that drugs and treatment are only beneficial to the extent that the people who need them have access to health care.

Unfortunately, despite a significant federal commitment to providing HIV care, thousands of people living with HIV in this country do not have access to health care that could save or greatly improve their lives.

The purpose of this briefing paper is to provide background information on the state of the HIV epidemic in the United States and to explain the various programs providing health care to people living with HIV. This document is not intended to be a comprehensive discussion of the full range of issues and possible policy changes relating to these very large and complex health care programs. Where issues are likely to receive serious consideration in the first session of the 105th Congress, however, key recommendations are made.

The National Association of People with AIDS (NAPWA), on behalf of people living with HIV throughout the nation, hopes that you will join with us to address numerous challenges and seek opportunities for improving access to health care for all in need.

THE HIV EPIDEMIC IN 1997

The human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) is the virus that causes AIDS.

Infection with HIV leads to weakening of the immune system, making individuals progressively susceptible to illnesses and conditions (opportunistic infections) associated with a declining immune system. Acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS) is a specific group of diseases or conditions which are indicative of severe immunosuppression related to infection with HIV. A person with AIDS is someone in the advanced stages of HIV disease.

Since the early 1980s, HIV has gone from an unknown disease to a global pandemic with major implications for the health and economies of all regions of the world. It is estimated that 21.8 million people are living with HIV, of whom 830,000 are children.<sup>1</sup> Approximately 42% of adult cases of HIV worldwide are among women.<sup>2</sup> In 1995, 1.3 million people died of AIDS-

WHO TAKES CARE OF YOUTH IN MANAGED CARE?

by James Colgrove and Robin Kirkpatrick

Not fitting neatly into the separate worlds of adult medicine or pediatric care, adolescents and young adults can face difficulties in receiving health services. With the advent of managed care, youth face another potential barrier to getting care.

Youth may not be suited to the carefully controlled procedures of managed care. As a population with unique developmental, cognitive and psychosocial needs that are poorly understood by many primary care providers, youth tend to be inexperienced as consumers of medical services, and less skilled at advocating for their own health needs. The health risks they face, such as sexually transmitted disease and unintended pregnancy, require special considerations to ensure confidentiality.

HIV positive youth face "double jeopardy" as a result of the limited choice of providers under managed care, since many physicians are unfamiliar with caring for people with HIV in addition to lacking experience in adolescent development. Some youth at high risk for HIV require mental health and substance abuse treatment that may be limited under managed care plans.

We recognize that the possibilities of increased access, improved services and lower costs under managed care are real. We also see a system, however, that is difficult to navigate, indifferent to the multi-dimensional needs of youth, and more focused on staying within cost control guidelines than providing comprehensive care. Managed care can take many forms, and the procedures are still evolving.

A significant issue for youth in managed care is being able to understand how to "work the system" so that it meets their health needs. According to David Knopf, a clinical social worker with the Teen Clinic at the University of California, San Francisco, "The presumption in managed care is that people overuse the

NAPWA's 1997 Strategic Agenda: Living the Vision Living the Mission

by Mike Shriver

If there was one message that came through loud and clear from our experiences in 1996, it was (and remains) that we are all connected. People living with HIV, people at-risk for HIV, friends, loved ones, community members — all of us are intimately linked, responsive to and ultimately accountable to ourselves, our peers and our constituents. The fine line between prevention and care, between research and housing, between civil rights and the entitlement programs is so thin as to be irrelevant.

In 1996, NAPWA was bold enough to articulate its belief in a cure. A belief in a cure, while not novel, is also not a single message, single pill, or simple program. We know that. And what made our belief so bold was that it became the very core of our work, be this work of our Speaker's Bureau, our Health and Treatment advocacy, or even our work to defeat the Dornan Amendment. And in order for this belief to become the core of our work, it meant we had to make a decided and meaningful shift in how we became accountable and to whom we became accountable.

NAPWA's belief in the cure is a belief in the individual. We said it in 1996 and we continue to mean it: "To believe in a cure is to believe that everyone living with HIV disease deserves to live well, live long, and live."

1997 is now upon us, and so is our need to articulate our vision plan that will lay the foundation from which all our work comes. 1997 is a year of promise and year of threats. In order for us to make the potential of 1996 become real, we

This issue explores access issues related to HIV positive youth, looks at the role of consumers in influencing Medicaid contracts with managed care providers, and discusses how to choose a health plan. ## A CASE FOR MEDICAID REFORM

by The Honorable John H. Chafee
U.S. Senator, Rhode Island

During the past two years, there has been considerable debate over the future of the Medicaid program. That debate will continue when the new Congress convenes in January of 1997. At issue will be whether the federal government will continue the entitlement to health care services for low-income families, the elderly, and individuals with disabilities. I believe that it is possible to reform our nation's health care system for low-income individuals without jeopardizing the guarantee of health care coverage for our most vulnerable populations.

Why has the Medicaid program come under increased fire? First, states and the federal government have seen record increases in the program's costs. Second, the Republican takeover of the House of Representatives and the Senate has resulted in a push to allow states more flexibility in managing federal programs.

Increased Cost --- In recent years, the Medicaid program has consumed an increasing percentage of state and federal budgets. From 1990 to 1995, the Medicaid program grew faster than any other segment of the federal budget. And although recent projections show a slowing in the rate of growth, there is no question that Congress must act to ensure that Medicaid spending, as well as other federal spending, is brought under control.

State Flexibility --- Originally, Medicaid was established to provide health care coverage to families that receive cash

This is the first of two special issues of The Active Voice to focus attention on managed care. This issue explores fundamental concepts of managed care for people living with HIV and provides a federal and state perspective on ongoing changes to our health care system. The next issue of The Active Voice will look at the impact of managed care on financing, and access issues for protease inhibitors and other new therapeutics. This work was made possible by a generous grant to NAPWA from The George Gund Foundation.

AIDS DRUG ASSISTANCE PROGRAM IN CRISIS

by Spencer Cox

Recent breakthroughs in AIDS treatment are offering people with HIV new hope for longer, healthier lives --- maybe even for the conversion of HIV infection to a chronic manageable disease. However, unless the federal government finds new funding to pay for drug therapies, more than 100,000 people nationwide may not be able to take advantage of these life-saving medical advances, not to mention well over 90% of people with HIV disease across the globe.

Since the beginning of the AIDS epidemic, payment for medical treatment has always posed a special problem for people with HIV. Many people with HIV are either already economically disadvantaged when their HIV status is diagnosed or become so as a result of their infection. Others steadily decline until they are unable to work and lose their private health insurance. According to Randy Pope, the State AIDS Director for Michigan, nearly seventy-five percent (75%) of people with HIV in Michigan rely on publicly funded health care to provide necessary medical care and treatments at some point during their illness. In New York State, more than half of all people with HIV disease find themselves in this same situation.

Traditionally, health care for wealthier patients was covered by private insurance companies, while health care for the poorest patients was covered by Medicaid. This has always left a substantial gap of people with HIV who are uninsured, and who are unable to afford private insurance. In addition, as managed care comes to dominate the private insurance market, many people are finding themselves without pharmaceutical coverage, or with inadequate coverage. Using federal funding from the Ryan White CARE Act, all fifty states have set up AIDS Drug Assistance Programs (ADAP) to cover AIDS drugs for people who would not otherwise be able to afford these life-sustaining and life-saving (and costly) pharmaceuticals.

According to David Barr, the Director of Treatment Education and Advocacy at New York's Gay Men's Health Crisis, "The therapies that are available now are more promising than
