Summary of Conclusions

-- There is increased opportunity for a more active U.S. diplomacy in South Asia, particularly with India and Pakistan. The Discussion Paper prepared for the meeting provides the basis for defining the step-by-step process for implementing a more active U.S. effort.

-- A primary policy goal is to help further stabilize Indo-Pakistani relations and, thereby, advance our policy interests, the most important of which is to prevent the outbreak of war.

-- The specific focus of our activity should be to enhance our bilateral relations with India and Pakistan and to support the apparent willingness of these two states to renew their bilateral dialogue, which has been suspended for almost two years.

-- We can best encourage that dialogue by helping the two parties develop an agenda of discussion issues which would infuse the dialogue with substance and positive content. In developing this agenda (particularly its economic dimensions), we should also try to identify concrete issues to which the United States can supply ideas, experience or good offices.

-- Agenda issues can include (but are not limited to):

- Conventional military confidence building measures;
- Kashmir (including the related issue of support for terrorism);
- Arms control and non-proliferation, including preserving nuclear ambiguity and keeping the two parties from crossing two major red lines -- nuclear testing and deployment of missiles;
- Economic development and trade, particularly projects that would encourage the strengthening of Indo-Pakistani economic ties; and
- Environmental issues, including nuclear safety and environmental problems common to both countries.

-- In preparation for more active U.S. involvement, an envoy should soon travel to the region. A more active phase of South Asian diplomacy could culminate in a POTUS visit to the region in the second half of 1997. As outlined in the Discussion Paper, a major speech on U.S. policy toward South Asia could be an important element in our approach.

-- We should maintain our current approach toward Afghanistan.

-- The IWG was tasked with fleshing out the approach and game plan. In the process, it should address more explicitly a strategy that: (1) helps India and Pakistan engage in a dialogue; (2) defines the U.S. role in facilitating this effort; and (3) provides detailed concept papers for identified agenda issues. Finally, there should be an accompanying Congressional strategy.

for defining the step-by-step process for implementing a more active U.S. effort.

-- A primary policy goal is to help further stabilize Indo-Pakistani relations and, thereby, advance our policy interests, the most important of which is to prevent the outbreak of war.

-- The specific focus of our activity should be to enhance our bilateral relations with India and Pakistan and to support the apparent willingness of these two states to renew their bilateral dialogue, which has been suspended for almost two years.

-- We can best encourage that dialogue by helping the two parties develop an agenda of discussion issues which would infuse the dialogue with substance and positive content. In developing this agenda (particularly its economic dimensions), we should also try to identify concrete issues ~~to which trilateral the U.S. interaction (U.S.-Pakistani-Indian) is possible~~ can supply ideas, experience or good offices.

-- Agenda issues can include (but are not limited to):

- Conventional military confidence building measures;
- Kashmir (including the related issue of support for terrorism);
- Arms control and non-proliferation, including preserving nuclear ambiguity and keeping the two parties from crossing two major red lines -- nuclear testing and deployment of missiles;
- Economic development and trade, particularly projects that would encourage the strengthening of Indo-Pakistani economic ties; and
- Environmental issues, including nuclear safety and environmental problems common to both countries.

-- In preparation for more active U.S. involvement, ~~a~~ Special Envoy should soon travel to the region. A more active phase of South Asian diplomacy could culminate in a POTUS visit to the region in the second half of 1997. As outlined in the Discussion Paper, a major speech on U.S. policy toward South Asia could be an important element in our approach.
